TITLE	Study by polarized Raman spectroscopy and nonlinear spectroscopies of graphene nanostructures.
DESCRIPTION	The aim of the research is to study the alignment of graphene and/or graphene oxide sheets within membranes useful for water purification. The alignment of the graphene and graphene oxide nanosheets will be studied during the different steps of the membrane synthesis by the use of the polarized Raman spectroscopy technique, and nonlinear spectroscopies such as second harmonic generation. Both techniques are aimed at establishing the orientation of the sheets and studying the anisotropy of the structure composed by the nanostructures. Polarized Raman spectroscopy will give electronic and structural information of the 2D materials involved in the macrostructure and will give information on their spatial orientation. The second harmonic generation technique allows us to obtain information on the anisotropy of the system through the study of the second order nonlinear susceptibility. By combining the results obtained, it will be possible to establish whether 2D materials are optimally oriented, and it will be possible to identify the key factors which should allow a better use of the membrane for water purification.

TITLE	Characterization and use of new adsorbent materials of natural origin for recovery of rare earths from aqueous solutions
DESCRIPTION	The main purpose of the research project is to find new materials of natural origin with high adsorption capacities toward metal ions belonging to the rare earths elements. The materials will be used as they are or after appropriate treatments for their functionalization or for the production of biochar. Rare earths belong to the list of "Critical Raw Materials" drawn up by the European Community and containing compounds and elements considered strategic due to their economic importance and high supply risk. The study will be done on synthetic aqueous solutions containing the metal ions of interest and having characteristics like those of the main waste materials containing them. The best adsorbent materials in terms of adsorption ability will be characterized using various instrumental techniques.

TITLE	Spectroscopic characterization of ferritins engineered and complexed with antennas and SPIONs
DESCRIPTION	The physical interaction between the HumAfFt and 10 nm SPIONs nanoparticles will be carried out in order to create a colloidal magnetic core ferritin based nanovector (HumAfFt SPIONs) with potential application in the theranostic field. In particular, UV-VIS and FTIR spectroscopies will be used at first, followed by studies on the structural characterization of the complex HumAfFt SPIONs by different and complementary techniques as EPR, SEM, AFM, TGA, DSC and DLS analysis. An in vivo approach will be also carried out through innovative confocal microscopy. In parallel, a set of novel antenna systems with appropriate lanthanide species will be encapsulated into the internal cavity of the engineering ferritin. Fluorescence and luminescence properties by means of steady state and time resolved fluorescence measurements will be studied. In particular, the photoactivated luminescence of these systems will be investigated by coupling UV-Vis absorption/emission and Fourier transform infrared absorption.

TITLE	Structure-property relationships in double halide perovskites
DESCRIPTION	The goal of this research project is to develop new halide perovskite compositions that display cation ordering at the B-site (monovalent and trivalent), and organic and inorganic cations at the A-site. Different dimensionality of the materials (3D to 1D) will also be explored. Electronic simulation techniques (periodic DFT) and experimental techniques (X-ray absorption spectroscopy) will both be used to draw general relationships between composition, atomic structure, and the properties of the materials.

TITLE	Synthesis and characterization of functionalized ZnO/cellulose based composites for innovative antibacterial supports
DESCRIPTION	The research activity will focus on the chemical synthesis of ZnO nanomaterials functionalized with silver or with enzymes resulting in systems with high antibacterial properties. The synthesis will be carried out through methods based on chemometric approaches to control the dimensions of the materials and to reduce the environmental impact of the synthetic process. The goal is the development of materials based on asymmetrically functionalized nanostructured ZnO, containing a propulsion unit sensitive to light or chemical stimuli and one capable of interacting with bacteria. The materials produced will enable to produce composites with functionalized cellulose, optimizing the stability of ZnO in aqueous media. The composites will be characterized by microscopic and electrochemical techniques. The antibacterial activity will be analyzed through a dual mechanism, based on the release of reactive oxygen species and zinc ions, and a mechanical rupture on the bacterial walls/membranes.

TITLE	Computational investigation of the deoxygenation reaction of biomass-derived molecules on supported metal clusters
DESCRIPTION	AGROMET is aimed at developing an original know-how for the design of innovative industrial processes for the waste valorisation to fuels and chemicals. Specific advances in the scientific knowledge will concern the fields of heterogeneous catalysis, computational and environmental chemistry. In particular, the catalytic wet air oxidation reaction will be investigated by means of computational density functional theory based approaches applied to model catalysts (metal clusters anchored on carbonaceous support) and substrates (biomass-derived model molecules such as guaiacol and isoeugenol). The investigation concerns the mapping at atomistic level of the catalyzed reactions of interest in order to obtain descriptors to be used in microkinetic analysis, so converting structural and electronic information to data that can be compared with the experimental counterpart.
